matter tonight:
"I have read the article pertaining to myself in the New York Herald of this moraling. So large a portion is incorrect that I cannot undertake any correct that I cannot undertake any reply to it. I will state, however, that while in Chicago in August, 1893, my attention was called to type written by unseen hands. This greatly interested me, in so much as I have spent over twenty-two of the best years of my life almost exclusively in the type-writer business.

intention of violence but were prevented by civil guards from doing any harm.

"The situation," says the governor, "is very serious, as the men have long been out of employment, have exhausted every means of living and are evidently determined that no non-union men shall work. Special engines are in readiness to take troups to the field of trouble and owing to actual service last year, the troops are evidently well qualified for good service.

The situation in the Elkhorn region shows no change at midnight. The governor expected to send troops there this afternoon, but received a telegram from Sheriff Eppler of McDowell county stating that nearly all the operators in the Elkhorn and Bluefields regions had asked for protection and ask ing the governor's advice. The governor wired that as the sheriff was on the ground and familiar with the situation he must act as his judgment dictated and must suffer no lawlessness of any character.

"In a low of reason?"

The physician recalled the passage.

"Do you think that Othello was suffering from delirium, or that he was responsible for his murder of Desdemonn? Persisted Recorder Goff.

"I do not think that he was delirious but that he was a man of violent temper who had merely been misled by the circumstances of the case and by the malignant instinuctions of others. He appears a sane man, however, in the play, and should suredly have been made accountable had he committed the act in real life," answered Dana.

"Is this also your opinion of Leontes, the jealous hero of Shakespeare's Winter Tale?' inquired the recorder.

"Both Leontis and Othello," replied the expert, "judging from the manner in which their characters are depicted in the plays, were to all appearances in sane, and should therefore not have been held accountable for their acts, had they committed them in real life." A recess was then taken.
